

Recent U.S. decisions to withhold certain arms transfers to Israel and the inconsistent reporting around those decisions highlight the challenges of accounting for vital resupplies to help Israel wage an unexpected, prolonged, multifront, and munitions-intensive conflict. The information presented is based on public reporting and JINSA discussions with officials knowledgeable of the arms transfers.

Because arms deliveries are not publicly disclosed, it is difficult to assess exactly which supplies the United States agreed to send since October 7, versus sales that were contracted before that date and delivered afterward – nor is this list likely to be exhaustive, given backlogged and incomplete reporting of agreed arms transfers by the Pentagon.
